The Secret Malts

Why 'Secret Malts'? The Speyside area is celebrated across the world for being the centre of Scotland's Malt Whisky Trail, with the largest number of distilleries of any of the whisky-producing areas of Scotland. Within an hour's drive from Aberdeen, however, there are also a number of small and intimate distilleries that are less well known than their cousins "over the hill". We call these the "Secret Malts" of Aberdeenshire.

Of the eight distilleries featured in this guide, most of them are relatively small in scale but each has its own distinctive history, style and taste. Visitors can get a real insight into the science and art of the distiller, whose skills have remained almost unchanged for hundreds of years.

Of the eight Aberdeenshire distilleries featured in this guide:

Four of them have small visitor centres and shops offering regular tours of the distilleries, normally with very knowledgeable guides;

Three of them are not officially open to the public, but will organise informal tours of the distillery, (often led by the Distillery Manager, who can offer a unique insight into how they make their whisky). Please contact them in advance to make an appointment;

One of the Aberdeenshire distilleries, Macduff, is not able to offer tours or visits but has been included in the guide so that you can read a little about its history and seek out the whisky itself.

We hope this guide helps you to explore the area and its distilleries and that you enjoy discovering the Secret Malts of Aberdeenshire.

Welcome to Aberdeenshire

Aberdeenshire is rich in beauty and heritage, from the inland summits of the Cairngorm National Park and Royal Deeside, to the stunning beaches, cliff tops and coves of the Banffshire, Mearns and East Grampian coasts. The natural environment not only provides a perfect backdrop for our wonderful distilleries, but also ensures that there's plenty to see and do whilst visiting the area.

In many ways Aberdeenshire is the epitome of what people expect to experience when they visit Scotland - malt whisky, salmon and trout-stocked rivers, over 50 challenging golf courses, barren moors, castles, Highland Games - all wrapped up in a warm welcome.

With more historic castles than anywhere else in the UK, Aberdeenshire is home to Scotland's only Castle Trail. The perfect complement to Aberdeenshire's whiskies is our world renowned food which boasts some of the freshest and most flavoursome produce in Scotland's larder.

Getting here:

Aberdeenshire has excellent transport links with the rest of the UK and Europe. Whether flying, taking the train, catching the ferry or driving, reaching the region is very easy. # How to Taste Whisky

It has taken well over 500 years for Scotch whisky to evolve into the rich variety of single malts, complex pure malts and distinctive Scottish blends that we know and love today. The history of each distillery as well as the nature of the landscape in which it sits and the method of production employed all play a part in the individual flavour and characteristics of the final product.

There are no set rules or right or wrong way to drink whisky. As long as it's enjoyed responsibly, there are many different ways to taste this revered spirit. Here is some basic guidance on how to start your journey;

You will need:

A clean tulip-shaped nosing glass

A jug of bottled still water at room temperature

A tulip shaped glass tends to be best for nosing. This will trap the aromas in the bulbous bottom of the glass and release them through the small area at the top. Whisky is often drunk from a crystal tumbler. This is perfectly acceptable, and is in fact more practical for drinking, however, the tulip shaped glass is better for nosing purposes.

Colour: Hold the glass up to a neutral background and have a good look at the colour. Colour can give an indication of age and wood finish, however, never trust your eyes alone. Any assumptions made on colour must be confirmed on the nose e.g. A dark rich amber coloured whisky may have been matured in an ex-sherry barrel from Spain or it may be an older whisky.

Body weight: Swirl the whisky around the glass, coating the sides thoroughly. Then wait, and watch the teardrops form and run down the side of the glass. If the legs run quickly, there are lots of them, and they are quite thin then it is probably a light-bodied whisky and/or a younger whisky.

If the legs take a long time to start running then run slowly down the side of the glass, there are very few of them and they are quite thick in appearance, then it may be a heavy bodied whisky and/or an older whisky.

Nose: Add a splash of bottled still water to your whisky. The water will reduce the alcohol content, and raise the temperature slightly releasing more of the aromas. Ensure you nose the whisky more than once. Your first nose will be a rush of alcohol and other characteristics will follow quickly. Holding your mouth open slightly when nosing will help you to take in more of the whisky's aromas. (You may wish to nose and taste your whisky without water first, and then add a splash of water to experience the nose developing).

Palate: Take a taste of the whisky and try to pick out any flavours you can remember. Even though you are tasting, your nose is still doing a lot of the work. Sometimes you will pick out flavours on the palate that you were not immediately aware of on the nose, and vice versa. Think about how the whisky feels in your mouth. Is it silky smooth, is it a little syrupy, does it feel tingly on the tongue?

Finish: Does the flavour last a long time? Does it disappear quickly? Is it long and warming, or short, crisp and dry?

Macduff

Designed by William Delmé Evans, Macduff Distillery lies within the old "policies" of Duff House, on the eastside of the River Deveron. A distillery consortium of four men purchased the land, using their business connections to establish the new distillery of Macduff. Production first began in 1960.

The design of the distillery was different to what had come before in a number of ways, for example:

- There was no malting on site
- The fermenters were made of Corton Steel (copper nickel and mild steel)
- The original wash and spirit stills were heated at low temperature by steam coils, an innovation at the time.
- Macduff was the first distillery to condense the spirit in shell and tube heat exchangers instead of worm tubs.

Over the years, the ownership of the distillery has changed hands, additional stills have been added and the still room extended and, in the 1970's, it was rebuilt to further increase capacity. Today, Macduff has the unusual combination of two wash stills and three spirit stills. The state of the art tun room has a total of nine wash backs.

This is a modern distillery built mainly for the purpose of supplying malt whisky for the blending industry. Only a small amount of Macduff is bottled as a single malt, usually as the clean and mild tasting Glen Deveron 10 year old.

Future Developments

Scheduled for opening in summer 2014, Duncan Taylor Scotch Whisky is developing a specialist whisky bottling plant in King Street in Huntly. This will cater for independent bottling of single malts and will incorporate a viewing gallery and tasting room for group visits.

Exciting future plans include the proposed development of a new distillery using a historic building on the outskirts of Huntly. When complete this would provide distillery tours and a visitor centre.

For further details on both projects, contact Duncan Taylor Scotch Whisky on +44(0) 1466 794055. www.duncantaylor.com

The legend of the 'secret malts of Aberdeenshire' continues!

The Lost Distilleries

Not only is the history of Aberdeenshire's lost distilleries fascinating, but their whisky is highly sought after by connoisseurs and collectors. During the 20th century, a number of distilleries in Aberdeenshire closed, due to various economic difficulties.

The First and Second World Wars and Prohibition in the United States all had a detrimental impact on the industry, though after World War II, a surge in demand meant that many distilleries were built in quick succession.

Demand then dropped again during the recession of the 1980s, which resulted in a number of Aberdeenshire distilleries being forced to close.

Many of the whiskies from the lost distilleries of Aberdeenshire are now hard to source and as a result are appreciating in value. When you do find them, they are a real treat.
